“ Once, when we were young, we were playing King of the Mountain on a giant mound in the neighbor's field. It took about 20 or 30 minutes for the neighbor to notice and run us off. When we went back home to Aunt Wilma's house, she asked us what we'd been up to. We were young and far too honest (or proud) for our own good, so naturally we told her the truth. She just said "uh huh" and grinned in her knowing way, then asked if we knew why he ran us off. It turned out that we were playing King of the Mountain in the neighbor's pile of manure. I don't think we ever asked if the neighbor called her or if she could tell by the smell. All I can say is that she didn't throw us out of the house, which is surely what I'd have done.

Though this story is certainly funny in retrospect, the point was that Aunt Wilma was always there for us ... all of us ... anytime she was needed, no matter how inconvenient it may have been. She was the backbone of the entire Taylor family and her absence creates a void that no single person will be able to fill or recreate. Going home is hard, so I'm not around much, but Aunt Wilma was loved by all and will never, ever be forgotten.
